Moving Treatment Planning

G. Harper

1Harvard Medical School, Boston, USA

In treatment planning we take clinical information and make a treatment plan. Though more complex than individual diagnosis and treatment, it is often not discussed. Treatment planning should get moving, should reflect the movement of children and youth, as they learn and grow, and should use language that is emotionally moving and experience-near. Here we define treatment planning, review conventional approaches and their limitations, and offer a more dynamic, inclusive approach based on consensus-based focal treatment planning.